

School of Paris

---

Paris in the early 20th century was a thriving centre of artistic activity, attracting artists, dealers and collectors from all over the world. Many new movements, including Fauvism, Cubism and Surrealism, emerged and were exhibited first in Paris. Collectively, they became loosely termed the School of Paris (École de Paris). Foreign artists mostly lived in Montmartre and then Montparnasse. Picasso was a leading figure, and another Spaniard living here was Joan Miró (1893–1983), a pioneer of Surrealism. The Italian Modigliani (1884–1920), famous for elongated sculptural figures, initially worked here with Romanian sculptor Brancusi. Chaim Soutine (1893–1943) arrived from Lithuania in 1913 to create pictures infused with angst and personal expression. Russian Marc Chagall (1887–1985) created dreamlike images, unrealistic perspectives and scales. Also classed as part of the School of Paris were some outstanding French artists, including Matisse, Georges Braque, André Derain (1880–1954), Bonnard, and Robert Delaunay. These vibrant collaborations and ideas came to an end with the outbreak of the Second World War in 1939.

Chagall, I and the Village, 1911