

Warhol, Lichtenstein and Hockney

Recognized as much for his flamboyant lifestyle as for his art, Andy Warhol (1928–87) started out as a successful commercial artist. He worked in many media, including drawing, painting, printmaking, photography, silk screen, sculpture, film and music. Exploring relationships between artistic expression, celebrity culture and advertisement, his bold, flat depictions of subjects ranged from Campbell's soup cans to film stars, both celebrating and condemning American mass culture. He broke new ground in deliberately mis-registering images, using assistants to produce much of his work, and presenting everyday items as art.

Roy Lichtenstein (1923–97), another leading American artist, used innovative methods of mixing mechanical reproduction with hand drawing to create large, dynamic, comic-style images that have become synonymous with Pop Art. Versatile British artist David Hockney (b.1937), meanwhile, used his draughtsmanship and sense of colour to incorporate the essentials in contemporary images that are usually brilliantly coloured and bathed in light.

Warhol, Marilyn, 1967